Is there really a stowaway in one of the lifeboats? And what's the truth about Germans and deckchairs? On a cruise ship full of passengers from different countries there's bound to be plenty of fun. Seventeen Seas follows a voyage through ten countries, fifteen ports, across seventeen seas, for forty-six days. Stories of the journey itself and the multiple destinations are told through the viewpoint of a variety of characters.

"Seventeen Seas is a travel-book with a difference." Excerpts – – In such a closed community rumours are bound to spread. And they did. – Step after step, eyes fixed rigidly on the end of each span, Ngaio moved on. – "You like gods? Pictures of Indian gods," said a pair of boys working in tandem. "Elephant-head god, monkey god, god with six arms..." – Yvonne thought of Eduardo and the woman who was prepared to travel in a train for a total of twelve hundred kilometers to see him for a few hours. – Once again Lynn heard it was the Germans who were monopolising all the deck-chairs. – Dick wondered if a fleet of speedboats under orders from a Somali warlord was heading towards them at that very moment. – If there were gods like this right on hand among the reeds of the Nile, why had Cleopatra lusted after the Romans? – Jovial Joe, passing through the lounge area on the lookout for last-day opportunities to cross off another joke from his list, saw his opportunity.
